October 29, 2026

1. Background

Amid growing trade uncertainties in the current geopolitical environment and the escalating technological competition among major economies, governments are rapidly adjusting their respective economic, trade and industrial policies, placing economic resilience at the forefront of their state strategy. Within this landscape, strategic focus has shifted toward supply chain reallocation, regional integration and the proactive industrial policies of key Asian economies. In particular, policy developments across Taiwan, South Korea and India, combined with the structural reorganization in the larger Asian and global supply chains, will decisively shape the next era of global trade and technological security.
